

human rights abuses

Vadim, Russian whom Browder hires as his head of research in 1997, leaves Russia

Ivan Cherkasov, Hermitage's Chief Operating Officer, leaves Russia

Sergei Magnitsky, Russian tax lawyer who stays in Russia and is ultimately imprisoned and tortured to death by Russian officials and for whom the Magnitsky Act is named

Eduard Khayretdinov, Russian criminal defense attorney whom Browder hires initially to defend Ivan; leaves Russia secretly

Vladimir Pastukhov, Moscow lawyer and outside counsel for Hermitage who counsels Vadim to leave Russia and later leaves himself

Jamison Firestone, American managing partner of a Moscow law firm, Browder's lawyer in Moscow

Edmond Safra, billionaire investor and Browder's first investor in Hermitage Capital

Beny Steinmetz, billionaire who brought Browder and Safra together

Artem Kuznetsov, corrupt, brutal Interior Ministry official

Major Pavel Karpov, corrupt lead investigator into Ivan Cherkasov's criminal case

Oleg Silchenko, Interior Ministry investigator who tortures Sergei through increasingly horrific living conditions

Congressman Jim McGovern, MA congressman and chairman of Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission who introduces the Magnitsky Act to the House of Representatives.

Senator Cardin, Maryland Senator who writes a letter to Secretary of State Clinton requesting all officials involved in Sergei's death have US travel privileges permanently revoked and introduces Magnitsky Act to Senate along with Senator John McCain.